Political Parties and Public Freedoms

April 22 and 23, 2025

At University Pole - Tassout

Preamble:

Party and political pluralism are defining features of the modern era, emerging as most countries abandoned the single-party system. The phenomenon of partisanship has evolved into a significant global political reality. This transformation resulted from a tumultuous struggle and the ceaseless efforts of humanity for its fundamental rights and freedoms. It demonstrated that a single opinion and voice are associated with dictatorship, propagating grand slogans like development and national goals at the expense of political expression, leading to failure on various levels.

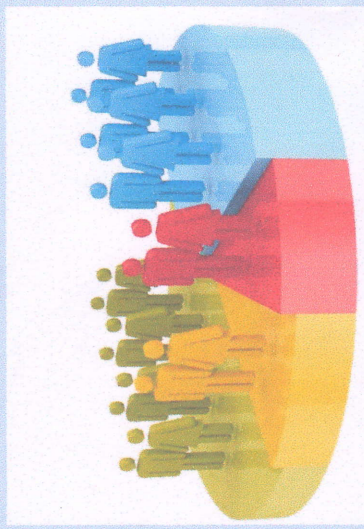

Facilitating a multitude of opinions and political expressions, exemplified by the diversity and multiplicity of parties, enriches national progress. This enrichment cannot be achieved by a single party or individual but necessitates collective efforts from everyone, irrespective of their diverse backgrounds and orientations, as long as their contributions align with the homeland and adhere to the prevailing laws.

The existence of political parties in societies utilizing party pluralism is not an end in itself; rather, it serves as a method for engaging in or maintaining governance. The primary goal is to carry out activities in the social and political life of the state, realizing the benefits of their political presence, especially in exercising public freedoms for citizens. The connection between democracy and political parties is inseparable, and philosophers and jurists of democracy and freedoms have expressed that hostility towards political parties conceals hostility towards democracy itself.

If political parties play a substantial role in promoting the public freedoms of individuals through various activities during electoral occasions or internal and external events, they undoubtedly possess the means to fulfill their functions. They are obligated to provide the necessary funds to cover these activities in accordance with the laws of the state; otherwise, they risk being held accountable through judicial processes, potentially leading to dissolution and cessation of existence.

The primary objective of any party's activity is to gain power or participate in it to implement its programs. The means to achieve this involve securing the trust of the people through elections, a peaceful method facilitating desired change. The effectiveness of the electoral system significantly contributes to strengthening the pluralistic party experience.

As democracies have adopted the idea of voting as a means of assigning authority, embodying the political direction determined by a majority, they have sought the best methods to implement voting. The aim is to ensure that the voting process genuinely reflects the collective will of the voters, leading to the formation of a parliament that authentically represents the people and possesses actual authority to make decisions. While democracies recognize various electoral methods and systems, the choice of a specific system depends on the political and social circumstances of the country, with a commitment to adhering to established rules and mechanisms.
