Preamble:

The challenge of environmental sustainability in the face of climate change is a strategic imperative for the continued preservation of the environmental dimension in the future. Given that sustainability, in its strategic dimension, refers to systems and processes that are capable of functioning and continuing on their own over long periods of time, environmental sustainability defines the way in which natural capital is preserved while also determining the basic quality of human practices in the moral and economic dimensions. Climate change involves threats and risks that challenge environmental sustainability, producing an increasing impact on the environment. Consequently, building future scenarios through an objective study of such risks and threats constitutes a fundamental approach to finding operational and realistic solutions to combat the negative impact of climate change and to effectively manage climate-related risks and threats. Based on the foregoing, the focus of this meeting addresses the following problematic issue: How to build effective strategies to confront the complex challenges of climate change to ensure future environmental sustainability."

Forum Objectives

- Discussing environmental sustainability awareness through the use of environmental data linked to climate variables.
- Building proactive strategies to address climate change and achieve environmental sustainability.
- Studying the impact of climate change on production and the creation of operational mechanisms to address future environmental hazards.

Forum Axes

- Axis1: Interpretative approaches to the concept of environmental sustainability and its relationship to climate change.
- Axis2: The ethical dimension of environmental sustainability in the face of climate change.
- Axis3: The economic dimension of environmental sustainability in the face of climate change.
- Axis 4: Strategies for managing climate-related risks and threats to achieve environmental sustainability.
- Axis5: Building environmental sustainability scenarios in the face of climate change: at the medium-term level (2050) and the long-term level (2090).
